

Blythwood returns to its roots in appointment of new CEO

Blythwood Care has named Rev Jeremy Ross, currently minister of New City Church, Dunfermline, as its chief executive designate. He will take up the post in October, initially shadowing chief executive James Campbell who has served the organisation for over 25 years and who will retire in early 2024.

A son of the late Rev Jackie Ross, Blythwood's founder and president, Jeremy was brought up in Lochcarron and has considerable knowledge of Blythwood's past and present activities having worked for the organisation from 1998 to 2007 and having served as a trustee since 2021.

Jeremy Ross, new CEO Blythwood

Jeremy says: "Since joining the board I've become more passionate about continuing the impact for good Blythwood has had on millions of people, both by sharing Good News and by helping with other aspects of life."

James Campbell, current CEO Blythwood

David Laing, chairman of Blythwood's trustees, says: "We were searching for a successor who shares our core conviction that everyone needs salvation through Jesus; someone who loves working with people – colleagues, volunteers, project partners and those who support Blythwood prayerfully and financially; and someone who will build on our history and James' unique legacy to take the organisation forward into the next phase of its ministry – recognising that it is God who directs and resources what we do.